Transmission

"Is impossible to think about the succession of generations without questioning transmission"

In 1991 the Revista Uruguaya de Psicoanálisis dedicated its double issue (71/72) to transmission, and three decades later, we take the opening words of its editorial to summon you to think about this idea in the breadth of its significance, within the framework of current socio-cultural and clinical theoretical perspectives.

These have been years of intense changes that have created new ways and possibilities in training and in the development of the clinical task. How can we think about these processes, from their history, their potential and their difficulties?

We are challenged to question ourselves, what effects does the immediate and vertiginous rhythm that prevails in our time, have on transmission?

The use of remote work and distance training generates new variables to be taken into account, for example, how do we think about the effects of changes in the framework on the dynamics of transfer? What challenges do the new modalities raise for our training?

We hope that this proposal will be motivating in the production of reflections from different points of view, which will allow us to continue questioning transmission.
